ALPHABETICAL ANSWERS
 This is a good fun-making game. Prepare cards with one letter of the alphabet on each, omitting X, Y and Z. Of course, if the company is large, several will have the same letter. A card is pinned on each guest, and it is announced that no one must answer any question except by a sentence commencing with the letter on his card, the answer being given before the questioner can count ten. No two players can question a person at the same time, and no one should give the same answer twice. If a player begins his reply with a wrong letter, or does not answer in time, his card is taken from him by his questioner, who adds it to his, and he then has the privilege of answering with either of his letters. The player who is without a card must seek to win one from someone else by questioning them.

BROKEN QUOTATIONS—This is a good "ice-breaker," as to play it, the guests have to mix considerably. The hostess prepares familiar quotations, writing them on paper and then cutting them in two or three parts, and pinning them in different places around the room. The guests must find as many complete quotations as they can, during a certain length of time. The parts being scattered over the room, it is not as easy as it sounds to find even the common quotations.

FOR A LARGE CROWD, an Auction Sale uses heaps of fun. Provide each buyer with a little bag containing 50 beans, with which to do his or her purchasing. The wares should be wrapped up beforehand in mysterious packages, and if the stonewall has a good "gift of the gab" an amusement is created from the bidding. This list of articles to be offered on the "sale table": one sent (small cologne bottle); a pair of Greece (empty vaseline bottle); a pair of kids (kid curlers); the link (an odd cuff link); bunch dates (old calendar); rank and file (onion and a nail file); the lost (a piece of string); the tie that binds (an old necktie); before the deluge (Noah's ark); a man's delight (a pipe); Black Beauty (a black diamond pin (a dime and a pin)); every girl hopes for (a match). Refreshments for a "Hard-Times" might consist of baked beans, ham sandwiches, gingerbread, apples, coffee, and home-made taffy. Costumes, there could be tramps or organ-grinders, gypsy girls or on.

5. Here are several which may appeal to you: Write names of provinces, states, or well-known countries on one set of slips for the men; names of the capital cities on the girls' slips; pass slips in separate receptacles, of course. Or the initials or Christian name of the girls may be written on slips, then folded and passed among the men. Advertisements may be clipped from the daily papers, torn in half, and each player has to find the "missing half" to complete the advertisement. A rather novel way, and quite different from any of the previous suggestions, is to have a "measuring committee." The guests have to (at intervals during the evening) "to the mark," and have their height measured. Each receives a slip of paper with his or her height marked upon it; when "hunt-your-partner" time comes the slips have to be compared, and those two whose height matches best "couple up," or if preferred, the tallest women and shortest men are mated, to add to the fun.
