The Diagnosis of Epistaxis.

is readily made except where the bleeding has occurred from the posterior nares during sleep and the blood has trickled into the pharynx and been swallowed. If vomited, it may be taken for hematemesis; if coughed up it may be confused with hemoptysis. It must be ascertained, before a diagnosis of hemorrhagic disease is made in the new-born, that the source of the blood found in the vomit or feces is not from a fissured nipple or from the nose.—J. H. Johnson; Journ. Kas. M. S.
