

house. Behind which the Ocean is to be seen stretching out - as far as the eye can reach. On the other side, a narrow strip of land, then a small Bay, another strip of land and then the vast Atlantic. On which were two or three sail boats. It was a very pretty scene and one which I hope I shall never forget. We returned by the north shore. The Ocean lovely and the rocks immense. We passed the old Devonshire Church and paid it a short visit. It is very old but kept in pretty good repair. The old organ still remains and the high pulpit - with the reading desk down below it. The roof was growing in at the windows and covered quite a lot of the outside. It was built in 16 - . The Church yard contained a great many flat stones which covered the family vaults. On account of lack of ground vaults are used altogether and are built with two parts so that a grave need not be opened for a year after anyone is buried in it. In 20 years only dust remains.
