24 TO COME

Syringing the Ear.

The dangers incurred in syringing out the middle ear in the presence of a chronic discharge are very great indeed. All watery fluids encourage bacterial growth and enhance what is the main object to prevent and avoid. Syringing is always liable to have the effect of driving sepsis further afield. I never syringe on any pretext, and entirely disapprove of syringing the ear in any way whatever in the presence of a discharge. Wiping out the ear with twisted wool is all that is necessary and advisable to entrust to the patient.—Mr. W. Stuart Low; The Hospital.
