Typhoid-Differential Diagnosis—No. 1.

In rare instances typhoid fever may simulate cerebrospinal meningitis, or acute nephritis, or the infection may be very severe from the start, and take the character of a profound septicemia. It may simulate malaria, from which it is distinguished by the temperature curve and the examination of the blood. A diagnosis of typhoid pneumonia, i.e. a pneumonia caused by the typhoid bacillus and of typhoid-malaria (a double infection due to B. typhosus and the malaria parasite) should not be made unless their presence is demonstrated by laboratory tests.—Rueck; Med. Record.
